History of Hassei F-4
Tamagawa-cho Hassei is the area on the map.

During the war, the Tamagawa-cho Hassei district was developed as a residential town for employees as military supply factories moved in from Nagoya. It was a major project, with about 500 homes, a rotary, major facilities including post office and kindergarten, and wellbeing facilities including a movie theater and public bath. Its name is derived from Seitaro Yokaichiya, who worked on the urban development. Even now, the eight streets branching out from the roundabout carry traces of the time.

water diversion walk

The Shibasaki water diversion, a waterway that branches off of the Tamagawa Aqueduct, goes through Akishima and continues until Shibasaki-cho in Tachikawa. Walking this way from Matsunaka Bridge, you'll see some areas of pastoral scenery along the unlined waterway. The culvert continues for some time, making the stream hidden from view, but you can enjoy the developed water diversion along the way at Musashino Park. In the park is a hill with a fine view, as well as a rail monument to the Nakagami Side Track.

On the present JR Itsukaichi Line, there was once a leg between Tachikawa and Haijima. Opened at the start of the Showa period, it was closed after less than just 15 years. Now a road, it still shows traces of its railway past. Within the city are many names related to railways, such as Haijima Station Street and Gotetsu (Itsukaichi Railway) Street, and places where odd-appearing wide spots in roads near traces of train stations. You can enjoy a walk along these "unseen railways."
